Excerpt from book: A BLOT IN THE SCUTCHEON. ACT I. Scene I. The interior of a lodge in Lord Treshams park. Many Retainers crowded at the window, supposed to command a view of the entrance to his mansion. Gerard, the Warrener, his back to a table on which are flagons, etc. 1 Retainer. Ay, do! push, friends, and hen you ll push down me! What for? Does any hear a runners foot Or a steeds trample or a coach-wheels cry? Is the Earl come or his least poursuivant? But theres no breeding in a man of you Save Gerard yonder: here s a half-place yet, Old Gerard! Gerard. Save your courtesies, my friend. Here is my place. 2 Retainer. Now, Gerard, out with it! What makes you sullen, this of all the days I the year? To-day that young, rich, bountiful, 10 Handsome Earl Mertoun, whom alone they match With our Lord Tresham through the country-side, Is coming here in utmost bravery To ask our masters sisters hand ? Gerard. What then ? 2 Retainer. What then ? Why, you, she speaks to, if she meets Your worship, smiles on as you hold apart The boughs to let her through her forest walks, You, always favorite for your no-deserts, You ve heard these three days how Earl Mertoun sues To lay his heart and house and broad lands too = At Lady Mildreds feet; and while we squeeze Ourselves into a mousehole lest we miss One congee of the least page in his train, You sit o one side theres the Earl, say I What then, say you ! 3 Retainer. I ll wager he has let Both swans he tamed for Lady Mildred swim Over the falls and gain the river! Gerard. Ralph, Is not to-morrow jrly inspecting-day For you and for your hawks ? 4 Retainer. Let Gerard be ! He s coarse-grained, like his carved black cross-bow stock, Ha ! look now, while we squabble ...
