

Essays in War-Time

[...]hampered and wine is scarce, it is difficult even to get ones foreign letters. In fact the preparations of war are rapidly changing the genius of the Island. Thereupon Erasmus launches into more general considerations on war. Even animals, he points out, do not fight, save rarely, and then with only those of other species, and, moreover, not, like us, with machines upon which we expend the ingenuity of devils. In every war also it is the non-combatants who suffer most, the people build cities and the folly of their rulers destroys them, the most righteous, the most victorious war brings more evil than good, and even when a real issue is in dispute, it could better have been settled by arbitration. The moral contagion of a war, moreover, lasts long[...].
