Not illustrated. 1842 Excerpt: ...and in the fine sand a great many verses, all accommodated to his melancholy, and some in praise of Dulcinea. But those that were found entire and legible, after he was discovered in that place, were only the following. 143 143 These strophes are remarkable, in the original, for a singular arrange merit and for the oddity of the expressions necessarily used to rhyme with Don Quixotes name: singularities entirely lost in the translation. Ye trees, ye plants, ye herbs that grow, So tall, so green, around this place, If ye rejoice not at my woe, Hear me lament my piteous case. Nor let my loud-resounding grief Your tender trembling leaves dismay, Whilst from my tears I seek relief, In absence from Dulcinea Del Toboso. Here the sad lover shuns the light, By sorrow to this desert led; Here, exiled from his ladys sight, He seeks to hide his wretched head. Here, bandied betwixt hopes and fears By cruel love in wanton play, He weeps a pipkin full of tears, In absence from Dulcinea Del Toboso. Vol i. The addition of Del Toboso to the name of Dulcinea, occasioned no small laughter in those who found the foregoing verses; for they concluded that Don Quixote imagined that if, in naming Dulcinea, he did not add Del Toboso, the couplet could not be understood: and it was really so, as he afterwards confessed. He wrote many others; but as has been said, they could transcribe no more than those three stanzas fair and entire. In this amusement, in sighing, and in invoking the fauns and sylvan deities of these woods, the nymphs of the brooks and the mournful and humid echo to answer, to condole and listen to his moan, he passed the time, and in gathering herbs to sustain himself until Sanchos return. If the latter had tarried three weeks, instead of three days,...
