El. 9. mentioned, as I suppose you will not undertake to defend all the Actions of Tyrants and Murderers; so I do not think myself at all obliged to defend all the Women who have been guilty of some of their Crimes. The Dispute is not whether there have been any ill Women in the World, but whether there are not more Good. And when I have told you that the Book that condemns Dalilah, cries up Zborah and Jaeli That if Homer has represented Helen guilty of some Faults (for you will see that Homer does not represent her Cause so violently bad) he tells us of Hecuba and Andromache, and a Thousand others who were very good ones; That if Clytemnestra was false to Agamemnon, Penelope was as famous for her Truth to Ulysses; and so put you Example against Example, which I forbear to do, only because it is so very easy; should I, I say, do but this, you could not complain that your Arguments were unanswered. But truly, Sir, we might carry the Thing much farther; we might defend some of those Women you mentioned, and excuse the rest. For Dalilah I shall say nothing, out of Respect to the Scripture, that represents her as an ill Woman; it is possible, were she alive, she might tell you in her own Defence, that what Account you have of her, is from her her professed Enemies: That however taking the Thing as they tell it; if she did commit a Piece of Treachery, it was against an Enemy of her Country; and that it was very hard (he would be so much run down for the same Thing they have so much admired in Jael and Judith, as well as every body else did in Marcus Brutus (he would perhaps push her Defence further, and tell you, that though she deliverd Samson to the Philistines to be kept Prisoner, yet she neither drove a Nail through his Head...
