Not illustrated. 1874 edition. Excerpt: ... one thing you cannot understand, you cannot logically deny that there may be other things which defy your keenest comprehension and your most subtle analysis. What, after all, is this Life, which is such a common word amongst us? What does it really signify?--what is it? Physiology may accurately describe its conditions; and shows, truly enough, that when these conditions cease to be fulfilled, Life ceases. But only the grossest materialism contends that Life depends upon a certain combination of chemical forces; and if we are to look no farther, we must own that individual immortality is a delusion and a dream. Grant that Life is nothing more than what materialists urge that it is; are we satisfied that the /--the selfasserting personality that still exists, however much the outward form may be mutilated; the unknown power that produces will, and sets the limbs in action, and evolves thought and the language of speech,--is equally dependent upon certain fixed conditions of gases and minerals? Is there not, in short, something beyond and above all this?--that, in fact, which we allude to when we speak of the Soul? And therefore, if we are convinced of the hidden existence of this strange energy, without which human life is pointless, shall we be rational if we deny that such a thing as this mysterious Psychic Force has equally a place in Nature, if we witness certain phenomena unaccountable on any other theory? Some such process of reasoning as this was probably in Serjeant Cox's mind when he commenced his investigation of the great problem, What am I? As Serjeant Cox is not a professed surgeon, physician, or analytical chemist, there are many statements on scientific subjects relating to the laws of human existence which we may not take...
