

Poitiers

As the first of the great raids, that of Crecy, had been designed to draw off the pressure from Edward III.s troops in the South of France, and to bring the French levies northward away from them, so the second great raid ten years later, which may be called by courtesy the Campaign of Poitiers, was designed to call pressure off the English troops in the north and to bring the French levies down southward away from them. As Edwards march through Normandy had been a daring ride for booty, so was the Black Princes ride northward from Aquitaine; and as Edward from the neighbourhood of Paris turned and retreated at top speed from before the French host, so did the Black Prince turn from the neighbourhood of the Loire and retreat at speed from before the pursuit of the bodies which the King of France had gathered. And as the one great raid ended in the signal victory of Crecy, so did the other end in the signal victory of Poitiers.
