

The Story of a White Rocking Horse

One by one the lights went out. One by one the shoppers left the toy department of the store. One by one the clerks rode down in the elevators. At last all was still and quiet and dark that is, all dark except for a small light, so the night-watchman could see his way around. Now we can have some fun! cried a voice, and it seemed to come from a Calico Clown, lying down in a box next to a Bold Tin Soldier. Now we can really be ourselves, and talk and move about. We can, if we are sure there is no one to watch us, bleated a Lamb on Wheels, who stood on the floor near a White Rocking Horse. You know, as well as I do, Calico Clown, that we cannot do as we please if there are any eyes watching us, said the Lamb. No one can see us, said the Bold Tin Soldier. I am glad the clerks and shoppers are gone. It will be some time before the watchman comes up here, and my men and I will be glad to move about. All ready there! he called to his soldiers, for he was captain over a brave company of tin warriors. Attention! Stand up straight and get ready to march! You have been in your box all day, and now it is time to come out!
