CHAPTER XLV THE PATTERN LADIES: MB. DALE: LADY BUSSHE AND LADY CULMER: WITH MBS. MOUNTSTUABT JENKINSON _lady Busshe and Lady Culmer entered spying to right and left. At the sight of Mr. Dale in the room, Lady Busshe murmured to her friend: Confirmation! Lady Culmer murmured: Corney is quite reliable. The man is his own best tonic. He is invaluable for the country. Miss Eleanor and Miss Isabel greeted them. The amiability of the Pattern ladies, combined with their total eclipse behind their illustrious nephew, invited enterprising women of the world to take liberties, and they were not backward. Lady Busshe said: Well? the news! we have the outlines. Dont be astonished: we know the points: we have heard the gun. I could have told you as much yesterday. I saw it. And I guessed it the day before. Oh! I do believe in fatalities now. Lady Culmer and I agree to take that view: it is the simplest. Well, and are you satisfied, my dears? The ladies grimaced interrogatively. With what? With it! with all! with her! with him! Our Willoughby? Can it be possible that they require a dose of Corney? Lady Busshe remarked to Lady Culmer. They play discretion to perfection, said Lady Culmer. But, my dears, we are in the secret. How did she behave? whispered Lady Busshe. No high flights and flutters, I do hope. She was wellconnected, they say; though I dont comprehend what they mean by a line of scholars--one thinks of a row of pinafores: and she was pretty. That is well enough at the start. It never will stand against brains. He had the two in the house to contrast them, and ... the result! A young woman with brains--in a house--beats all your Beauties. Lady Culmer and I have determined on that view. He thought her a delightful partner for a dance, and found her rather t...
